

GS Basics – Mag 6 Capex. Look Who's Talking? AI Jobs

Geopolitics/Oil: Overnight you had a brief wobble in risk around confusion on who is actually at the negotiating table with Iran. That seems to have been clarified, and we remain in a fragile ceasefire ...at least for now. Into the weekend there's a growing debate on the path forward. It's a though one but my base case is we are more likely than not to get some headlines about talks resuming...probably via Pakistani channels. But talking is easy; resolution is much harder. The issue from here is that inventories are rapidly depleting. Everyday you are not open it compounds the problem, You're seeing it clearly in products...dec gasoline, heating oil, gasoil all pushing to fresh highs. . So yes, you can get another relief rally on "talks"...but without a concrete outcome this dynamic is more negative than it would have been in weeks prior. Betting markets are now assigning only a low probability (low teens) to a near-term resolution in the Strait of Hormuz by mid May. Dec 26 Brent still the best expression in my view.

Equities, for now, just don't care. Fair enough, Q1 numbers have bene in the category of amazing. The focus is still squarely on AI driven demand. Pre-releases from ENR with blowout orders and strong numbers from Intel reinforce the same message...more compute, more power, more infrastructure. The story is evolving beyond GPUs...memory and broader AI "scaffolding" ie CPU + optics are emerging as the real bottlenecks. That's consistent with what you're hearing across the supply chain...DRAM, packaging, power, cooling.

Mag 6: Job cuts at Meta and Microsoft (mid-single digit %) are interesting. Superficially positive for margins, but it raises a tension: if they're cutting costs while input prices for data centers are rising, you likely still get upside pressure on capex. Hard to see a world where AI demand accelerates and capex doesn't follow. Given all these cost inputs are ballooning are you about to get some serious question on cost pressure/ ROI from the hyperscalers?

Technicals: A lot of what we're seeing feels reflexively tied to energy. My models say late cycle tightening (generally one of the worst quadrants for risk...ie curve flatter and yields higher). There's a disconnect between the front end and equities that probably resolves if energy rolls over. Vol is holding firmer at low levels; Europe looks short gamma, while the U.S. after the sharp bounce likely sits back in long gamma territory. Positioning is where it gets more fragile. NAAIM exposure index out overnight now back to 94 ...add to a series of indicators that are showing folks sharply risk on again. You're heading into month-end at elevated levels, with a large rebalance at end of month (one of biggest sell imbalances we've had in a decade). 17 straight up days for the SOX...yea there is a lot in the price.

Risk: Markets are high and so is energy...this isn't a clean shock you can reverse quickly. Logistics matter...tankers out of position, refining constraints, and tight product markets mean the impact lingers even if headlines improve. Interesting to see survey data like the Gallup economic confidence index is extremely weak, which is a notable divergence between markets and households. Trading wise, it still feels like the next headline dominates. If you had to guess, the most likely near-term catalyst is “talks back on” over the weekend...which probably means higher first, and then reassess. But zooming out, there’s less technical impulse to buy here, and the asymmetry is starting to tilt the other way...so I have been and remain cautious at these levels.
